Excerpt: . . . e and its distinct history rather than a product of supercomputers and other hocus-pocus, as they would indicate or imply. And I will add the television networks, the media outlets, and local communities that support the bowls also have strong opinions about, along with millions invested in the longstanding and low and now, of course, very lucrative tradition. So my colleagues, the hearing today is an attempt to allow members of the committee an opportunity to learn more about the bowls, the BCS, the ranking systems that operate, and the process that takes all the ingredients and data and determines the two most qualified teams in college football without a playoff elimination structure. Being invited to a bowl game, particularly one of the four bowls that are under contract with BCS, not only is a great honor, but it also translates into millions of dollars of additional revenue for the schools, whose teams participate as well as the conferences they represent. The intersection of the big time sports...
