While the courts transition plan specifies initiatives to coordinate court The Court Has activities with social services, the Family Court and District social service Initiated Efforts To agencies face challenges in coordinating their respective activities and services in the longer term, such as the time it will take to obtain Coordinate Its interagency commitments to provide resources and to coordinate their Activities with use. Today, we can offer some preliminary observations of efforts to coordinate family court activities with social services - our ongoing District Social examination of these efforts and related challenges will culminate in a Services, but Faces more detailed assessment of factors that facilitate and hinder planned coordination later this year. Challenges in Achieving Longer Collectively, the Family Court Act and court practices recommended by various national associations provide a framework for planning, Term Coordination establishing, and sustaining court activities that are coordinated with related social services. Specifically, the act requires the mayor, in consultation with the chief judge of the Superior Court, to make staff of District offices that provide social services and other related services to individuals and families served by the Family Court available on-site at the Family Court to coordinate the provision of services. These offices include CFSA, District of Columbia Public Schools, the Housing Authority, OCC, the Metropolitan Police Department, and the Department of Health. The act also requires the heads of each specified office to provide the mayor with such information, assistance, and services as the mayor may require. In addition, the mayor must appoint a liaison between the Family...
